Born in Honolulu, Hawaii, Inouye was an exceptional student and athlete. But with the outbreak of war, his life took an unexpected turn. Along with thousands of other Japanese Americans, he was forcibly removed from his home and interned in a camp.

Despite the hardships he faced, Inouye remained determined to prove his patriotism. He volunteered to serve in the US Army, becoming a member of the famed 442nd Infantry Regiment.

Valor on the Battlefield

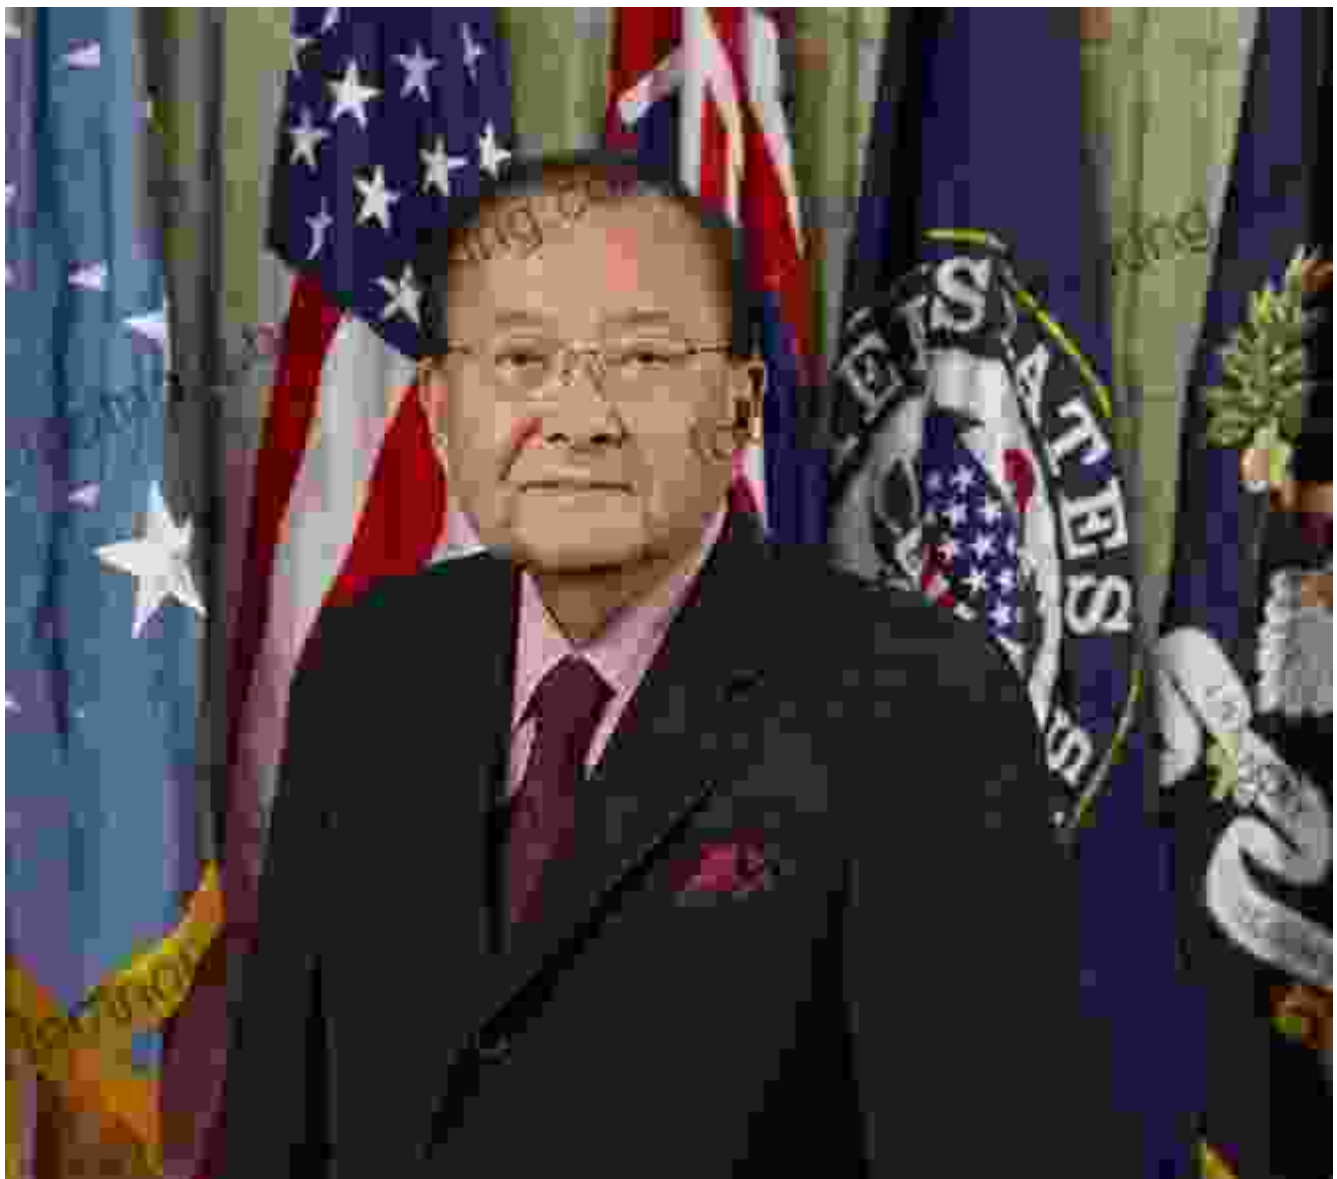

The 442nd Infantry Regiment, known as the "Go for Broke" Regiment, was composed entirely of second-generation Japanese Americans. They fought with unmatched bravery and determination, earning the highest casualty rate of any American unit during the war.

Inouye himself was repeatedly wounded in battle, but he refused to be sidelined. He led his men through some of the war's most intense fighting, earning numerous medals for valor, including the Medal of Honor, the highest military decoration in the United States.

Rising Through the Ranks

After the war, Inouye returned to Hawaii and resumed his studies. He entered politics and quickly rose through the ranks, becoming the first Japanese American elected to the US Congress in 1959.

Inouye served in the US Senate for almost 50 years, becoming a respected and influential figure. He fought tirelessly for civil rights, veterans' affairs, and international diplomacy.
